Junk mail unstoppable

If you are like thousands of other Canadians, your mail box is constantly jammed with advertising flyers offering discounts on everything from haircuts to go-aways. This junk mail problem can often be solved by a simple trick: just don't take it. If you don't take it, it won't be there. If you don't take it, it won't be there. If you don't take it, it won't be there.

Although the post office doesn't have the authority to stop junk mail, it can help you get rid of it. The post office can help you get rid of it. The post office can help you get rid of it. Club promotes contest

by Todd Maxwell

President of the Mechanical club

Contests last many days that require within the college but one club is in charge of the Mechanical Club on the M.C.C.C.

The club has been operating in Kingston's Town square for the last 20 years. All students involved in the mechanical programs are automatically members of the club.

In order to raise funds, they hold shows, parties and other events such as the annual fund-raiser at the main house throughout the year.

The club has recently won, and a cash award for its members. However, they would like to encourage people from other programs to participate.

"We just want to get other people involved in our own club," said Steve Capodaglio.

The contest will consist of a mechanical design problem, which appears last Friday and is closed that week to solve.

If you wish to enter this contest, then complete the questionnaire and get it to the club, and it will be mailed to the club of you or more people have the right solution, it will be held at the design center. The winners will be given the Golden Globe, and a $1000 member scholarship at the M.C.C.C.

The winner will receive a cheque for $1000.

Wayne Landon's answer was picked out of all correct answers and he was awarded the first $1000 cheque. There is no cost to enter. If you wish to give that question a try for the fun of it, the contest will be published in the next issue of Spoke.

Washroom antics cause suicide

by Cindy Power

He couldn't face the stress of his family finding out the truth. So why did he do it?

Jim (Arthur) Christman, 38, now was charged with gross indecency in connection with alleged homosexuality in a public washroom at a local shopping mall in St. Catharines.

Police declined to wait until after Christmas, to lay the charges because of the "irresponsible impact" that the incident of the accused. It was just the chance one of the men needed to escape.

On the afternoon of Dec. 18, this man, a successful salesman and a Sunday school teacher, kissed his wife and two young children goodbye, told them he loved them and then walked home.

He took his company car, drove to another village, dressed himself with grooming and shaved his leg hair. Then he knew his family would find out sooner or later? And he knew he would find out even though he never found out.

A few hours prior to his suicide, he was summoned to the police station in St. Catharines. He was then charged with gross indecency.

He was just one of the "irresponsible" men charged. Others included a musician, a bank manager and a respectable family man.

If the salesman couldn't live with it, why did he do it? One police officer said he was charged with a similar offence in November. At the time the salesman told the officer he was "going through a middle crisis" and he didn't know why he was doing what he was doing, only that he didn't want to be able to stop.

According to friends, neighbors and co-workers, he was, as appeared to be, a respectable man. One associate said, "He was respectable and moral in every sense of the word."

His boss in Toronto said he had known an excellent salesman since joining the company in 1975.

Respectable or not, something was definitely wrong with him and all the other "respectable" men charged. It's something about what is happening in public washrooms. It's even worse than that, and what type of men are involved in these situations. It's not a private look before an important person and wonder. Apparently you can't go by who they are or what they do anymore.

In this case with the salesman, what about his family? They are a family that is extremely married and involved in church activities, Brown and children's sports. The family's name hasn't been revealed in the news yet but it's probably only a matter of time. Now that the salesman has committed suicide, his family will be caught up from the St. Catharines. Maybe he made his quick escape, but what position has he left his family in?

His suicide alone, would be enough to devastate his family.

His car was found around 1 p.m. Saturday on the shoulder of a rural road. His body was slumped over the driver's side of the front seat. He was found so badly that his identity wasn't clear. It was made that weekend. Police had to call experts to identify the body.

While police and investigators agree on the role of the accident car, the victim's wife reported him missing. It was not known whether she knew of the latest charges before his death.

In this case, one has to feel sorry for the guy. He obviously had problems, but what about all the other men involved in these situations?

Other incidents of men involved in washrooms have occurred even in stores in front of St. Catharines. The question is why?

Police and prosecutors are still trying to figure it out.

What's happening is how many places in St. Catharines that we don't know about? Who starts it? How can it be stopped?

There are many questions to be answered on the topic. One thing is for sure, the answers should be found — before too many more suicides. Respectably the men who don't know what they're doing like the case of the salesman.
